

This technology study provides an overview of modern newspaper printing. It includes the production of newsprint, ink technologies, prepress and platemaking, the actual printing process (web offset lithography or flexography) and postpress. Recent developments are highlighted. The report places newspaper production in the context of economic and social change that is putting unprecedented pressure on newspaper printers.

Methodology

The changes that are taking place in newspaper printing mean that there are few books on the subject that are not already out of date. This report therefore draws heavily on Pira's own research and publications. Many specialist publications (e.g., Newspapers & Technology, Webline, Paper Magazine, Printweek and Ink World) are available online, and there are also some exclusively online resources for the print community (such as Printingtalk at www.printingtalk.com). Many of the latest technical developments are reported on companies' own websites and some (e.g. Flint Ink) include detailed discussion of their industry sector as a whole.

Useful trade bodies include the Newspaper Society, the World Association of Newspapers, the Confederation of Paper Industries and the Pulp and Paper Products Council and they have useful websites. Other useful organisations include the Printers' National Environmental Assistance Center, the Webline Printing Association, and the Newsprint and Newspaper Industry Environmental Action Group.

Definitions

Technical terms are explained in the text, but a ready-reference (especially when it comes to acronyms) can be useful.

AM screening

Obtaining halftones by printing a regular pattern of dots of different sizes (amplitude modulated).

CIE (Commission Internationale de l'Éclairage)

Body that set down the earliest standard definition of all colours used in printing.

Calibre

Print process that relies on absorption/evaporation to dry the ink.

Continuous tones

Changes in shade that move smoothly from one to another without sharp boundaries between them. Most portraits, for example, would show continuous tones.

CTP (computer to plate)

The digital processing of the image from the point where the page is laid out on the computer to the making of the plate. Contrasts with analogue systems where a photographic negative would be required. Some authors use the formal CTP.
