

Stigma and the Burden of Infection

Dr. David A. Asch, University of Wisconsin-Madison

Stigma is a social process that occurs when a group of people holds negative attitudes and beliefs about a particular group of people. Stigma is often associated with infectious diseases, such as HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis, and hepatitis.

Stigma can have a significant impact on the health and well-being of individuals who are stigmatized. It can lead to social isolation, discrimination, and even violence.

Stigma can also have a significant impact on the health and well-being of the community as a whole. It can lead to a lack of trust in healthcare providers and a reluctance to seek medical care.
