

Society

'Structured relations and institutions among a large community of people which cannot be reduced to a simple collection or aggregation of individuals.' (Giddens and Sutton, 2007)

The concept of society has long been part of sociology's self-identity, often bound up with the idea of the nation state.

In the 1950s Functionalists suggested that society constrains the individual.

John Urry (1999) suggests that globalisation has rendered the concept of society less relevant.

He suggested sociology might move 'beyond societies' – and focus instead on 'mobilities'.
