

Later Life Letter

Your last day as a frontline social worker and you're still up writing later life letters: a few pages for an adopted child to read when they are old enough to understand, a voice to speak across the years. I have my own. I first read it aged eighteen.

My social worker wrote in her own hand, to tell me that I have two brothers; that my father was a stone mason; that he went fishing with his father; and the two families often shared a Sunday roast. It tells me that my parents split and that my mother didn't know she was pregnant. My birth was a surprise. I'm not sure if I believe that, but like the absence of the kind of horror stories you bring home from work, I was glad of it. I wish you'd rest and come to bed but you write on, hunched over your desk, sweat beaded on your forehead as you speak softly across the years: she tried her best, she loved you very much.
