Abstract

Man lives within a social context he finds himself involved in. He is doomed to choose in spite of the fact that he has had no choice in his coming to the world. Man's being in the world subjects him to a series of social, political, ideological, and theological challenges that, at the end, induce a major transformation in his essence. This existentialist predicament suffered by modern man makes him stand at the brink of the precipice of nihilism where nothingness lies there enveloping many lived phenomena that may appear rationalist and meaningful. Through the characters and the technique of writing, Kafka's The Castle embodies this fluctuation between nihilism, with all its implications of the loss of meaning, and the existentialist mode of thought that tries to annihilate nothingness through social and political involvement in spite of the fact that nothingness is believed to be enveloping everything.

This paper seeks to investigate this philosophical oscillation both on the level of the text and its technique of writing and of the characters who are deeply involved within the political bureaucracy of the Castle, its ideological maze, and its theological anxiety. The spatio-temporal context K. finds himself involved in is one which asserts one fact that has been verbalized by Nietzsche: Man would rather will nothingness than not will at all.

Keywords: Kafka, existentialism, nihilism, The Castle.

1. Introduction

It cannot be said that we are lacking in faith. Even the simple fact of our life is of a faith-value that can never be exhausted. ... One cannot not-live, after all. It is precisely in this "cannot, after all" that the mad strength of faith lies; it is in this negation that it takes on form (Blue Octavo Notebooks, Kafka).

Kafka's theological orientation is one that stands midway between nihilism and existentialism. It "revolves around a God who has either retreated or who does not exist; at the same time, it encourages faith and demands individual responsibility" (Hawkins, 2003). The dilemma central to Kafka's work is of a mind "torn between the desire to live and that of dying to life in the consuming service of his vocation: the art of literature" (Heller, 1975). This dilemma offers "wider implications touching upon a universal irresolution of the modern sensibility" (Heller, 1975). The central theme governing Kafka's work is the quest for truth undergone by his heroes; heroes stuck in a state of bewilderment resulting from their exposure to the world and its futile institutions. Kafka's heroes are positioned in a state similar to that of Plato's man whose sole perception of reality "is a play of shadows thrown on the wall of his prison" (Heller, 1975).

Kafka's problematic conceptions and philosophy have been projected in The Castle. The notion constituting the basis for Kafka's thought has mainly been the concept that "man lives... at the point of juncture between nature and spirit, and thus being situated in ambiguity, lives in a state of crisis" (Scott, 1952). In the novel the reader "is faced with the shocking spectacle of a miraculously sensitive soul incapable of being either reasonable or cynical or resigned or rebellious about the prospect of eternal damnation" (Heller, 1975). Kafka is neither an atheist denying God's presence, nor a nihilist denying any worldly values and goals. Instead, Kafka, or rather K., is "a person continually tormented between the castle up above and the powers below; a person torn between doubt and hope" (Kung, 1991). He is the modern man who is condemned to be free in a world that deprives him of the very same thing it forces on him.
