Abstract: Martin Heidegger argues against the possibility of Christian philosophy in his Introduction to Metaphysics. Christians, Heidegger tells us, cannot authentically ask the fundamental question of philosophy – ‘Why are there beings at all rather than nothing?’ – because they already suppose that they have an answer to this question in their Creator-God. Moreover, Christianity, says Heidegger, takes philosophy to be foolishness and, thus, would never try to answer its questions in the first place. Finally, Heidegger insists that any thoughtful questioning in a Christian context is theology and not philosophy. I argue that none of these reasons for rejecting Christian philosophy ultimately holds up. I also criticize an interpretation of Heidegger on this topic proposed by Walter Kaufmann.

Heidegger and Christianity

Martin Heidegger's relationship to Christianity is a busy field of research and has been for some time. This is the case not just because Christian thinkers have sought to appropriate Heidegger's work for their own ends – the likes of Rudolf Bultmann, Karl Rahner, and John Macquarrie immediately come to mind – but because Heidegger himself had a close personal connection to Christianity and it deeply influenced his thought both positively and negatively. Up until his mid-twenties he was a loyal Catholic, even intellectually so. As a graduate student, he understood himself to be a philosopher working within the Aristotelian-Scholastic tradition (albeit one who wanted also to engage with modern philosophy)¹ and in 1915 submitted a Habilitationsschrift with the title Die Kategorien- und Bedeutungslehre des Duns Scotus.² But by twenty-eight Heidegger was drifting away from a personal adherence to Catholicism and turning toward Protestantism, yet it is unclear how deep was his commitment to the latter or how long it endured.³ Heidegger never definitively broke with Christianity of some form (Welte (1977), 256; Sheehan (1993), 72).⁴ But for the rest of his life he would shift back and forth between appreciation and critique of it. During the 1920s he gave courses and lectures on St. Paul, St. Augustine, the mediaeval mystics, Luther, and the relationship between phenomenology and theology (Heidegger (1996); (1998a); (2004); Schlier (1977)). At this same time, while he was teaching at the University of Marburg, he befriended Bultmann, and the two frequented each other's courses (Wolfe (2014), 153-154). In 1938 Heidegger wrote of his ongoing ‘confrontation with Christianity’ (Auseinandersetzung mit dem Christentum) and of how he still clung to some elements of it but had left others behind (Heidegger (2006), 368). And in remarks dating from 1953-54, responding to the suggestion that he is ‘at home in [Christian] theology’, Heidegger tells his interlocutor that ‘[w]ithout this theological background I should never have come upon the path of thinking’, adding that ‘[o]rigin always comes to meet us in the future’ (Heidegger
