Study Abroad And Early Career:

Examining the Impact of Undergraduate Study Abroad on Early Career Outcomes: A Mixed Methods Approach

Noah Goldblatt, 2019 This study examines impact of study abroad on early career outcomes at a professionally focused northeastern private college A mixed methods sequential research design provides a thorough inquiry into the influence of study abroad on early career outcomes at this institution In the first quantitative phase of the study The National Organization of College and Employer's NACE First Destination Survey data is analyzed to assess whether a study abroad experience has an impact on career outcomes The quantitative results compare career outcomes for 2014 2015 and 2016 graduates who have studied abroad n 523 and those who did not study abroad n 661 The quantitative survey contains 1184 participants and represents a response rate of approximately 90% of the total graduates at the college The second qualitative phase examines the quantitative results in order to help explain and provide insights into the outcomes A theoretical lens of appreciative inquiry is applied as a framework for interpreting the results and informs the qualitative line of questioning In this project studying abroad did not prove to significantly impact early career outcomes Based on the NACE First Destination Survey the higher education industry standard for capturing career placement information graduates from this college got no quantifiable positive early career impact from studying abroad In fact some trends in the data even show an early negative effect from having studied abroad especially for female graduates Further trends in the results contradict assumptions about study abroad that are held by students and international educators However meaningful impacts of studying abroad on graduate's vocational clarity along with personal and professional development are revealed in the qualitative phase of the study that simply cannot be captured in the NACE survey
