The Buried Half Horizontal, Half Vertical Mattress Suture: A Novel Technique for Wound Edges of Unequal Lengths

Wound edges in dermatologic surgery are often unequal in length, and they may result from crescentic excision or repair of a Mohs micrographic surgery defect. A novel suture technique combining a buried half horizontal and half vertical mattress, which the authors abbreviate: “Hovert,” is primarily used to reduce length discrepancy, distribute tension evenly along the length of the wound, and preempt the need for standing cone excision.

Method

The Hovert can close any curvilinear wound or defect with unequal wound edges. Starting on the longer wound edge, a buried suture is placed horizontally in the deep dermis following the arc of the needle (Figure 1). On the opposite and shorter side, the needle is placed in the same dermal plane, but the needle is oriented vertically and positioned at the midpoint of where the horizontal suture would meet the opposing wound edge. The suture is tied at the lower end of the half vertical mattress and buried, approximating the longer wound edge to the shorter wound edge.

This technique is repeated along the wound edge in an interrupted fashion. The Hovert is best initiated at one of the lateral apices of the excision (Figure 2) rather than in the middle, permitting progressive shortening of the longer wound edge with minimal tension as one closes from one end to the other.

This technique is best performed using a Precision-3 (P-3) needle. The smaller bite of the needle (approximately 5–10 mm) avoids excessive bunching of skin. The P-3 needle is clamped below the shank, so only half of the full curvature passes through the tissue. In addition, one can pull the suture ends less tightly before tying to avoid over-correction of the longer edge. However, even if bunching is noted, the experience of the authors suggests that this
