

Teaching Standard English: Whose Standard?

Charles M. Friesenberger

When I was a young child, my first language was English and I, too, learned to communicate with my fellow students through a set of highly complex, unspoken rules. I never, of course, knew the explicit rules that govern communication in standard English. I was also never told where these conventions came and how they were. I never communicated in my first language.

When I first began to communicate with my fellow students, I never knew why I was in school. I never saw myself as being in school and I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school and I never knew why I was in school.

When I was in school, I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school.

When I was in school, I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school.

When I was in school, I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school.

When I was in school, I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school.

When I was in school, I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school.

When I was in school, I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school.

When I was in school, I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school.

When I was in school, I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school.

When I was in school, I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school. I never knew why I was in school.
