

Character and Ethical Theory

JOEL KUPPERMAN

Ethical philosophy has provided two very different models of choice. In one, an agent encounters a situation in which two or more alternative courses of action are available. He or she then tests these against a rationally derivable theory. If the theory is Kantian, this means that each alternative is to be tested against the categorical imperative: Can the agent will the maxim embodied by the alternative to be a universal law? Does it treat other rational beings as ends instead of means? Could it play a part in an ideal moral realm? If all options pass the test, then any one of them is morally licit. If "imperfect duties" are involved, then moral grounds are still relevant to a decision; in the more frequent case in which imperfect duties are not involved, the decision has to be made on grounds that lie outside of morality and outside of Kant's theory. Any option that fails the test of the categorical imperative is immoral. If there are two options and one fails, then the other is our duty.¹ In the decision procedure of consequentialism (one form of which is the classical utilitarianism associated with Jeremy Bentham and John Stuart Mill), one compares the likely consequences of the various alternatives or of the policies they represent. The strategy is to maximize value: One should choose the action, or follow the policy, that is likely to lead to the greatest value in the world.²

In the other model, an agent is assumed either to have a formed character or to be in the process of forming one. Thus choice takes place against a background of habits, inhibitions, and patterns of satisfaction with certain kinds of behavior. The agent either has the desire (or lack of desire) to become a certain kind of person, or has the satisfaction (or lack of satisfaction) in being a certain kind of person. When difficult choices present themselves, character is crucial. Thus, if given a ring of invisibility that made it possible to do anything with impunity, most people would behave badly, according to Plato; but someone whose virtue is not a matter of habit only, who "has philosophy," can choose a good life.³ Aristotle suggests, as the test of whether someone really possesses a virtue, that what is crucial is whether he or she enjoys behaving in the manner corresponding to that virtue.⁴ In the Analects of Confucius the suggestion is made, even more sharply than in the works of Plato and Aristotle, that for

Eudemian Ethics Books I, II, and VIII Aristotle, 1992-11-05 Anyone seriously interested in Aristotle's moral philosophy must take full account of the Eudemian Ethics a work which has in the past been unduly neglected in favour of the better known Nicomachean Ethics The relation between the two treatises is now the subject of lively debate This volume contains a translation of three of the eight books of the Eudemian Ethics those that are likely to be of most interest to philosophers today together with a philosophical commentary on these books from a contemporary point of view Like the other volumes in the series it is intended to serve the needs of readers of Aristotle without a knowledge of Greek and the aim in the translation has been to give as accurate an idea as possible of Aristotle's text but for the benefit of those who are able to read the original there are notes on the Greek text used for problematic passages In preparing this new edition Michael Woods has made use of the much improved text of the Eudemian Ethics that has recently been published as an Oxford Classical Text and has taken into consideration recent philosophical work on Aristotle's ethics The Clarendon Aristotle Series is designed for both students and professionals It provides accurate translations of selected Aristotelian texts accompanied by incisive commentaries which focus on philosophical problems and issues The volumes in the series have been widely welcomed and favourably reviewed Important new titles are being added to the series and a number of well established volumes are being reissued with revisions and or supplementary material Introduction Translation Commentary Notes on the Text and Translation Select bibliography Glossary Index
