

Adaptive teaching is when teachers make on-the-fly tweaks and adjustments based on whether students are struggling in the moment. The responses will vary in how much differentiation is made, but the more inclusive approach that assumes all students are provided with the opportunity to succeed. Teaching is then just providing a single subject matter or skill set package to students in a classroom setting. High expectations that allow every student the opportunity to succeed. The core message of adaptive teaching is being tailored to students who might need more scaffolding or support. Research by Lori Connel emphasizes the importance of the mathematics, skills, and time adjustments made by teachers that support every student's teaching of a new learning goal. These on-the-fly changes result in every teaching concept being mastered by every student, ensuring the understanding of every student and ensuring the specific focus.

There are many things you can do to help your child's learning. For example, you can read to your child every day, talk to your child about what you are doing, and encourage your child to ask questions. You can also help your child learn by playing games that involve counting, sorting, and classifying objects. For example, you can play a game where you sort objects by color or shape. You can also play a game where you count objects. These are just a few of the many things you can do to help your child's learning.
