web mar 7 2016 1. A ripple tank is a shallow tank of water in which waves can be studied. It consists of a rectangular tank of water, about 10 cm deep, with a glass plate at the bottom. A light source is placed above the tank, and a screen is placed below it. The light from the source passes through the water and is reflected by the glass plate. The reflected light then passes through the water again and is reflected by the screen. The pattern of light and dark regions on the screen shows the wave pattern in the tank. 2. The ripple tank is used to study the properties of waves, such as reflection, refraction, diffraction, and interference. It is also used to demonstrate the relationship between the wavelength, frequency, and speed of a wave. 3. The ripple tank is a useful tool for studying waves in a controlled environment. It allows students to observe wave patterns and measure their properties. It is also a good way to introduce students to the concepts of wave motion and wave phenomena.
