Felfe, Christina et al. "Sports and Child Development". PLOS ONE, vol. 11, no. 5, 2016, pp. 1-23. Web.

The primary purpose of this article was to analyze how participation in sports during preschool and primary school shape children's education, health, and behavior. The introduction of this article acknowledges that a considerable number of children engage in various sports activities, approximately "65% worldwide". This study focuses on children aged three to eleven years who participate in sports clubs in Germany. Felfe et al. used the German Health Interview and Examination Survey for Children and Adolescents (KiGGS) and German Child Panel (GCP) to collect data about impacts sports on children development. Felfe et al. analyzed the collected data to determine the relationship between the study's variables and conclude its findings.

Felfe et al. main point is that participating in sports positively impacts children's academic performance and social relations. Felfe et al. used the findings of their study and information drawn from previous studies to support their argument. The results of the study confirmed Felfe et al. point by showing that children who participate in sports have improved health, portray excellent academic performance, and have positive behaviors. Felfe et al. used other research in the discussion section of this article to support their findings and the idea they presented. This research article is closely related to work of Hodge et al., Messner and Musto, and Lee et al. because they focus on the same topic: sports and their impacts on children's development.

This article is important because it evaluates the impacts of sports participation on children's academic performance, behavior, and health. These are which vital indicators of a child development are. The findings imply that participating promotes and enhances growth in children. This article will help develop and support my essay by using various points. For example, it will help substantiate my argument that sports participation boosts cognitive development among the schooling kids by showing it improves academic performance.
