Abstract. Aims of the investigation: The aim of the present study was to determine the effect of the use of a mobile phone on the performance of a simulated driving task. Methods: The study was conducted in a laboratory setting. The participants were 15 experienced drivers, who were asked to perform a simulated driving task while using a mobile phone. The task was a 10-minute driving task on a closed track. The participants were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The control group was asked to perform the task without using a mobile phone, while the experimental group was asked to perform the task while using a mobile phone. The dependent variables were the time taken to complete the task, the number of errors made, and the heart rate. Results: The results showed that the use of a mobile phone significantly increased the time taken to complete the task, the number of errors made, and the heart rate. Conclusions: The use of a mobile phone while driving is a distraction that can lead to decreased performance and increased risk of accidents. Therefore, it is recommended that drivers should avoid using a mobile phone while driving.
