SUMMARY

This case describes the use of innovative person-centred motivational behaviour change tools to enhance chronic condition self-management with a person with chronic paranoid schizophrenia, significant drug abuse and multiple psychosocial issues. In standard care, the complexity of this patient's presentation, their cognitive impairment level and history of violence would likely exclude them from many therapies and treatment programs as unsuitable or in the "too hard" basket. In fact, using a motivational and highly person-centred approach proved to be extremely necessary and rewarding for the person and their mental health worker. This approach provided a clear structure, actual tools and a clear rationale for what many would argue, yet is often ill-defined, was "just good clinical practice". However, it also facilitated the development of "something special" in the relationship between the person and their worker that is central to person-centred care. Through a semi-structured, motivational, sequential process that encouraged gradual disclosure and greater self-awareness by the client and active listening by the worker, greater collaboration and shared responsibility was enhanced.

BACKGROUND

This case report offers a new perspective on an old problem: that of comorbid drug abuse and chronic mental illness and how to effectively treat this problem in mental health community service settings. Comorbidity is often associated with high service utilisation, severe and complicated illness course, poor treatment outcomes,¹ and multiple social, economic, legal and interpersonal costs for the person involved and their community.

Traditionally, mental health services have struggled to address or effectively treat patients with comorbid drug abuse because they have focused on what they assess as the primary psychiatric disorder and largely ignored the secondary drug abuse problem. Mental health workers often accept comorbidity as part of the patient culture, feel overwhelmed by the chaos it creates for the person, or avoid it due to lack of skills to take any action to address it. As a consequence, the comorbidity has often confounded treatment effectiveness for these populations who either overutilise services as a result of the chaos they create or are excluded from services altogether as rigid boundaries are drawn. This continues to be a pervasive problem for mental health services, addiction services and primary care providers such as doctors in their attempts to treat comorbidity effectively.

Treatments for substance abuse have relied heavily on the transtheoretical model of change and motivational interviewing^{2,3} to assess peoples' readiness to change and hence the timing, type and targeting of interventions. However, people with comorbid drug abuse and mental illness are often judged to be at the precontemplation stage, either by choice or circumstance, with little prospect of change. The transtheoretical model has offered little to the person or service providers in assisting these people to move from this position to contemplate change.⁴ Over the past decade, the Flinders Human Behaviour and Health Research Unit has developed a person-centred model to support behaviour change. This "Flinders Model" is based on a structured assessment process that is performed in a motivational way, combined with problem solving and goal setting, underpinned by cognitive behavioural therapy principles and procedures that can be monitored and systematically measured over time to record progress. The model has been used in populations with a broad range of health conditions in Australia and internationally.⁵⁻⁹ Several clinical trials using the model have been completed or are currently underway within Australia, New Zealand and the USA in the areas of veterans with alcohol abuse, cardiac and respiratory rehabilitation, diabetes management, stroke management and indigenous health, as well as more general applications in primary care. The Flinders Model is firmly endorsed by a number of Australian State Departments of Health and health service sectors in Australia as part of their efforts to address the growing burden of chronic disease.^{8,10}

The subject of the following case report was 1 of 38 participants in an Australian feasibility study testing the effectiveness of the Flinders Model tools with a community mental health service population sample.⁸ The Flinders Model tools comprise four steps:

- The Partners in Health (PIH) scale, a brief 14-item self-assessment questionnaire filled out by the patient assessing their perceived current self-management knowledge and behaviours, and the physical, social and emotional impacts of their chronic conditions.
