Bornhorst,Rodney C. Johnson,Geological Survey (U.S.),1993 The south half of the Ishpeming greenstone belt is dominated by a thick succession of subaqueously erupted volcanic rocks A regional structural interpretation of the belt provides a framework for placing this succession in a stratigraphic order The south half of the Ishpeming greenstone belt preserves the remnants of overlapping subaqueous volcanic complexes within an arc system The Kitchi Formation as redefined herein comprises the lower half of the volcanic succession and is subdivided into three informal units The basal basalt flow unit is composed of pillowed tholeiitic basalt flows and minor banded iron formation and dacitic tuff It is overlain by the second and third units which are tuff and lahar volcanic debris flow units that inter finger with one another These units range in composition from calc alkalic basalt to dacite The Kitchi Formation represents an evolving tholeiitic mafic shield to calc alkalic mafic to felsic subaqueous volcano The Mona Formation which is redefined herein is in structural contact with the Kitchi Formation but is likely younger It is subdivided into three informal units The base consists of a basalt flow unit which is composed of pillowed tholeiitic to magnesium rich basalt flows and minor amounts of banded iron formation and tuff The basalt is overlain by a calc alkalic dacite to rhyolite lapilli tuff unit and a laterally continuous upper tuff unit of calc alkalic basalt to andesite The Mona Formation represents an evolving tholeiitic mafic shield to mafic felsic calc alkalic mafic to felsic subaqueous volcano The Deer Lake Peridotite an ultramafic sill complex that intrudes the Kitchi Formation is speculatively interpreted as a subvolcanic ultramafic komatiite base of the Mona Formation
