name the animal in 1847 and explicitly set it in opposition to the hunter. They are exceedingly ferocious and always offensive in their habits, never running from man as does the Chimpanzee. The hunter awaits his approach with his gun extended; if his aim is not sure, he permits the animal to grasp the barrel, and as he carries it to his mouth, which is his habit, he fires. Should the gun fail to go off the barrel, that of an ordinary musket, which is thin, is crushed between his teeth, and the encounter soon proves fatal to the hunter. It was this image of the gorilla that became a staple of adventure fiction, including Du Chaillu's works and Ballantyne's The Gorilla Hunters.⁹ As John Miller argues, the figures of the hunter and the gorilla occur in a kind of doubling prevalent in Victorian primatology, and especially The Gorilla Hunters, this complex relation perhaps most forcefully articulates post-Darwinian anxieties about the fixity of species and the meaning and status of humanity. Ballantyne already made some errors in his descriptions of nature in The Coral Island and had apparently resolved, whenever possible, to write only about things of which he had personal experience.¹⁰ Still, his gorillas are portrayed as dangerous man-eaters, snapping great branches in two while pursued by hunters. As a gorilla nutritionist said, that Ballantyne's fictional gorilla likely would have been peacefully nibbling on the branches' leaves. Ballantyne's gorilla, on the contrary, is a man-monkey, a very unnatural monster.

Description from Wikipedia, the free encyclopedia

The Gorilla Hunters
R. M. Ballantyne, 2022-12 R. M. Ballantyne, a Scottish author, wrote the boys' adventure book The Gorilla Hunters in 1861. Ralph Peterkin and Jack, the three lads from his wildly popular 1858 novel The Coral Island, are the main characters of this sequel, which is set in darkest Africa. The themes in the novel echo those of The Coral Island, where the lads attest to the benefits of missionary activity among the locals. A major theme of the book is the hunt for gorillas, an animal that was unknown to Westerners until recently but has since become crucial in discussions about evolution and the interactions between white Westerners and Africans. A slave trader is the focus of the second part of the book's plot, and the three hunters and their guide spend weeks pursuing him to stop him and his crew from occupying and enslaving Mbango's people. They are too late: Makarooroo's fiancée is one of those who have been taken. The three plan the fortifications and successfully repel the trader when he attacks Jambai's settlement. The hunters rest for a few weeks in the village of a different tribe, which is governed by a Jambai family member.
