as Fishermen wondered why they caught Balsam and Spruce their nets full of forests not fish and They touched places light could not reach Most of the poems are titled after the name of a ship the year of the wreck and the lake in which the ship met disaster The book's time frame spans from wrecks that precede the Civil War to those involving modern ore carriers Throughout this collection are six Deckhand poems which give face to a fully imagined deckhand and offer a character for the reader to follow someone who appears and reappears surfacing even after others have drowned Who and what is left behind in this collection speaks to finality and death and things made for dying Very little is known when a ship sinks other than the obvious there was a collision a fire a storm or an explosion Hunter works to fill in these gaps and to keep these stories alive with profound thoughtfulness and insight Tony Hoagland said that one of the powers of poetry is to locate and assert value This collection accomplishes that task through history and imagination producing lake lore that will speak to historians and those interested in ships poetry and the Great Lakes
