

himself, and there were, of course, the patents that bore Louis's first known name.

In 1938 the case of Living versus Russell was brought before Judge Myers of the United States Court of Delaware. The claim was for infringement of the Floyd Smith patents held by Living. The defendant counter-claimed that the Smith patents were the defendant's common-law right - meaning that the concept of manual operation had not been introduced by Floyd Smith as first demonstrated by Leslie Irvins, but dated back to the era of Ed- ward Blackwell and Leo Stevens. The initial hearing judge, Charlie Broadwick and Leo Stevens, the initial hearing brought together the greatest parachute technicians of the time. Leslie Irvins came from England. Leo Broadwick was there, and Leslie Ford, and the whole of the original McCook team. Their argument was that they represent the most truthful account of parachute design during that first thirty years of the century! Judge Myers found in favour of Russell, but the decision was reversed on the appeals court. The Russell Parachute Company eventually went out of business in 1956.

In 1934, when Marjory Smith's company was making some small headway as a potential rival to the Irving monopoly in America, George Waite kept them in their place through a successful action for infringement of patents pertaining to shipping bin storage systems and the ripcord handle — the only two details of the Smith Safety Chain that Floyd Smith had failed to design around.

It is doubtful, however, if the cleverness of the Irving management, their strong hand of patents, and the skill of their lawyers could alone have retained such a hold on the portable X-ray market. The proven quality of the product must be considered a factor. The proven quality for twenty years the Irving X-ray was the primary reason why for twenty years the Irving X-ray was virtually unrivalled. Had any other company been able to point to deficiencies in the Irving X-ray record, or had any of the more serious had reason to doubt the reliability of the equipment, the story would have been different. The story would then have been
