

There are several reasons why an experimentalist in this field cannot afford to ignore the work of the other two groups. First, the experimentalist's knowledge of the theoretical work of the other two groups is essential for the design of experiments. Second, the experimentalist's knowledge of the theoretical work of the other two groups is essential for the interpretation of experimental results. Third, the experimentalist's knowledge of the theoretical work of the other two groups is essential for the development of new theories.
