

The Rat and the Mouse

Rattus norvegicus and Mus musculus

Origins. These two closely related and excellent pets have been bred from many arthropodal ancestors. Tame rats were raised, by selective breeding, for laboratory work at the beginning of the century. They are natural enemies of the Norwegians, or brown rat, Rattus norvegicus (Bertholdus), which has spread throughout the world and is usually found in association with human habitation. The wild form has always been a major pest, feared as a carrier of disease as well as for its depredations. The tame rat, by contrast, is as useful as the wild rat is destructive. It is second only to the mouse as the most popular laboratory mammal, and so attractive that it is now an established pet, particularly well adapted to cage life.

Fancy mice have been raised from another commoned animal, the house mouse, Mus musculus Linné, which has also spread throughout the world, wherever man is, or grows his food, or stores it. Like the rat, the house mouse is a destructive pest, but was tamed in captivity at the end of the last century in an effort to find a small, prolific, laboratory animal. The project was so successful that the mouse is now the most commonly used laboratory mammal, and so attractive to its owners, home, that it has become a very popular pet, in spite of its origins.

Pattern-marked mouse and Dutch mouse

Long-haired mouse

Varieties. After almost 100 years of selective breeding, more than 50 different colours and varieties are recognized by the National Mouse Club. They are catalogued for their purposes under four headings:

Self Coloured. The self colours include white, black, blue, chocolate, red, fawn, champagne, silver, dove, and coccy.

Fax Varieties. These are mice of standard colour with a fax undercoat. They are known, according to the top colour, as black and fax, blue and fax, etc., and are most often bred with black, blue, champagne, silver, and dove top colours.

Mixed Varieties. These are the patterned mice. The varieties most often seen are broken-marked mice which have in many coloured spots or patches as possible described (usually seen a white ground), and Dutch mice (all which are marked as the Dutch rabbit (p. 47)).

Any Color Varieties. This is a large group and includes agouti and castaneous; chocolate; silver; silver grey; brown; and brown; pearl; Argentea; and point d'argent; and standard Houdan. Two others are mice of different countries: the long-haired, and the astox, which is the curly-coated mouse.
