

*The Development of Black Religion in America

C. Eric Lincoln

When Zedekiah, last king of Judah delivered Jeremiah up to the nervous rabble of his decaying establishment, those so-called "princes," too cowardly to murder the prophet out-right, dumped him into the muck of an abandoned well instead, and waited for nature to take its course. Tradition has it that Ebedmelech, the African, rescued Jeremiah and was rewarded by God's promise that in the terrible prospects of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Babylonian captivity then in the offing, he, Ebedmelech, would not be delivered into the hands of strangers.¹ There is another tradition that six centuries later, another African whose name was Simon helped Jesus struggle up Mount Calvary under the burden of the cross² which was to become the symbol of a New Jerusalem. Somewhere between Jeremiah and Jesus, somewhere between God's promise to Ebedmelech and Simon's travail on the way to Golgotha, somewhere between the death of the Jewish nation and the birth of the Christian religion, tradition takes on a compelling significance, the ramifications of which are now, 2,000 years later, set in insistent reverberation. At stake is the religious commitment and the religious identity of millions of Black Christians who want to shuck off their identification with White, American Christianity because the White expression of the faith is not always flattering to Black people and frequently demeans them. What Black Americans are now in search of is the reconstruction of an alternative circuitry which avoids the embarrassment of their association with American Christianity and re-establishes their connection with the faith through new understandings of God's will for man, and man's willingness to assume responsibility for his dignity and his destiny on earth.

Hence Pentecost takes on new meaning, for among those "devout men from every nation under heaven"³ who heard Peter proclaim the promise to them
