

tion. Not enough alternative program strategies are presented to substitute for those being criticized. In addition, some key policy positions are presented without adequate supporting data or concrete examples. More quantitative data are needed regarding trends in agricultural practices, comparative income streams from traditional and "improved" cropping systems, holding sizes, or the relationship between tenure policies and future immigration to former lands. How many villages, for example, have successfully incorporated new technologies into traditional systems? Lastly, little use has been made of comparative research on the situation in highlands areas outside of Thailand. The article on institutionalization was representative of the situation in hill Nepal, but there was no reference to the extensive literature resulting from that situation.

The Human Ecology of Tropical Land Settlement in Latin America. David A. Schimman and William L. Partridge, eds. Westview Special Studies on Latin America and the Caribbean. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1989. 467 pp. $35.50 (paper).

JOHN PRADHOMME
University of Pittsburgh

The "human ecology" of the title of this work is broadly defined, encompassing not only human culture and biological adaptation to the physical environment (which actually receives very little detailed coverage), but also adaptation to the interrelated facets of the local, regional, national, and international political economy (which constitutes the volume's main analytical framework). As Schneider notes in his foreword, "it is in the analysis of the political economy of land settlement where they [the authors] make their most original and important contribution" (p. xi).

The volume contains fourteen papers (only one of which is a reprint) arranged under "Introduction" (two papers); "Central America" (two); "North America" (nine); and "Epilogue" (one). The authors in the geographic sections describe one or two settlement communities or a colonization zone within a specific country—the exception being Jones, who summarizes the colonization process in most of Central America and provides a number of brief country-oriented examples. The papers are tied together by their focus on small-scale, pioneering farming settlements and the analysis of the factors contributing to the failure or success of these enterprises.

As revealed in the articles, the factors that influence small-scale pioneer farming are numerous, complex, and vary considerably from case to case. The introductory chapters (by Partridge and Moran respectively) provide an excellent overview and guide for placing the cases within the overall colonization framework, and the epilogue (by Ledee and Goodland) serves nicely to restate the cases within a natural environmental context.

All of the articles shed light on constraints to success, including, but not limited to, lack of security of land tenure; absence of adequate infrastructure; lack of familiarity with local environment and appropriate agricultural technology; absence of feasibility studies and climatological data; lack of initial capital; attenuation of social organization; and lack of educational and health services. In general, the articles reinforce the proposition that blame for the failure of development and colonization schemes usually does not lie with the small-scale farmers. Rather, the actions of these farmers are revealed to be reasonable adaptations to the larger system of political, economic, social, and environmental limitations and possibilities in which they find themselves embedded at any particular time. For example, the oft-cited idea that settlers frequently adopt ill-suited agricultural practices because they lack knowledge about the local natural environment and expertise in suitable and sustainable agricultural techniques is convincingly questioned. Both Joly and Cuapillas show that even indigenous groups (who possess this knowledge and expertise) in the colonization zones are drawn into new, negative production schemes by the forces of national policy, international interests, and economic opportunities.

Overall, the settlement schemes dealt with in the volume are regarded as unsuccessful (either in the short or long term), whether viewed from a broad socioeconomic or an ecological perspective. Specific suggestions for viable solutions are, however, generally lacking in the individual chapters, with the exceptions of Joly (who describes an alternative that is currently being tested in Panama) and Ledee and Goodland (who delineate some environmentally sound guidelines).

This volume, emphasizing as it does the analysis of the political economy of tropical land settlement by small-scale farmers, commentators and supplements previous work on the subject. It is essential reading for those interested in the subject and would help to enlighten those interested in any form of tropical forest development and conservation in Latin America.
