

1 MODELING AND ASSESSING LANGUAGE PROFICIENCY<sup>1</sup>

Since the beginning of this century psychologists and educationalists have been involved in a continuing debate on the number of factors implicated in language performance. Up till the late seventies factor analytic approaches have led to the definition of various numbers of language dimensions. In the early years of this century Spearman (1904; 1927) argued that a single factor, g, was of interest to explain all intellectual behavior. Thurstone's (1938) model contained seven primary mental abilities of which at least two were explicitly verbal: 'verbal comprehension' and 'verbal fluency'. Later researchers proposed several variables within the domain of language behavior alone (e.g. Davis 1944; Thurstone, 1946; Davis, 1972; Spearitt, 1972; Thorndike, 1973). Meanwhile, the division of g into several subfactors in general human intelligence models continued, almost always including a number of 'verbal' factors (Cattell, 1971; Vernon, 1971), and culminated in extremely complex models such as the Structure of Intellect model (Guilford, 1967; Guilford & Hoepfner, 1971; Guilford, 1982) with a total of 150 factors of which many are related to language behavior.

Much of this debate could have been avoided, given a better understanding of the poor quality of some measures to assess dimensionality (Carroll, 1989; Berger & Knol, 1990), problems in interpreting the results from correlational analyses in general (e.g., Cizko, 1985) and from exploratory factor analysis in particular (Gould, 1981; Vollermer and Sang, 1983), the equivalence of the metatheoretical assumptions underlying the different models (Stenberg, 1985a), or preferably, if Thurstone's (1947:56) own admonition, had been taken seriously, i.e., that "... factor analysis has its principal use at the borderline of science ... especially in those domains where basic and fruitful concepts are essentially lacking and where crucial experiments have been difficult to conceive".
