INTRODUCTION

During the Song Dynasty (960-1279), an economic revolution swept over China. The development of wet-field rice cultivation in conjunction with a great southward migration led to sharply higher land productivity in agriculture. At the same time, rapid expansion in domestic and foreign trade accompanied urban growth, and for certain commodities the market became a national one. The growing commercialization of the economy led to increasing sophistication in the means of exchange, and by the end of the eleventh century paper money was used in much of
