

his sensation. It is very curious to read the discussion which was provoked by this exposure of the hideous brutality of the casual ward of those days. Clergymen and officials seemed to resent the exposure as a personal affront. One workhouse master, arguing after the usual fashion of the offended official, asked triumphantly what trust could they put in the Amateur Casual, seeing that he had admitted that he lied in describing himself as an engraver! A man who was capable of telling one lie might tell two, and so forth. On the whole, however, the Amateur Casual and his brother had it all their own way. A storm of indignation was raised, and from that one night spent in the casual ward of the Lambeth Workhouse may be traced the beginning of the reform of our Poor Law, the latest result of which has been Mr. Fowler's Royal Commission.

REMOVAL TO NORTHUMBERLAND STREET.

From a journalistic point of view the success achieved by the "Amateur Casual" was complete. Its immediate effect was to institute an improvement in the means of producing the paper. Mr. Richard Lambert, the first foreman printer, writing on this subject, says:—

The demand for the paper now became so great that the machinery was incompetent to produce a sufficient number of copies, extra plates being taken and sent on to Saville and Edwards, in Chandos Street, to help us out of the fix. Four machines going, perfecting flat machines, producing about 1,000 per hour only.

From this time the paper made rapid strides. It was increased to twelve pages, and a four-feeder rotary ordered of Hoe and Co., New York. It was a long time before it arrived. The City of Washington, the vessel bringing the machine over, being overdue some seven or eight days, it was thought she was lost.

Meanwhile the office in Northumberland Street had been taken and fitted up ready for the machine on its arrival. It was considered a wonder at that time, and would "throw off the sheets like flakes of snow," as Mr. Greenwood remarked at the time.

It was a busy time removing the plant from the "mud-bank" to the new premises. It was accomplished, however, successfully one Saturday evening after publication, and a look round on the Sunday morning to see all things "fixed up" properly. One four-feeder being found insufficient, a six-feeder was now ordered.

THE MORNING PALL MALL.

From the first Mr. Smith and Mr. Greenwood seem to have had hankerings after a morning paper. The paper had not been in existence for many weeks before they issued a morning edition, Mr. Hamilton Fyfe being Mr. Greenwood's assistant. There was, however, so very little difference between the morning and evening editions, that this change did not entail very much work either on the literary staff or on the composing-room. The morning edition continued for about a month, and then, as it evidently was not wanted, it died a natural death without having entailed either much inconvenience or much loss. Very different was the attempt which was made in 1870, when a gigantic first number was issued of a morning paper complete and distinct in every respect from the evening edition. It ran for four months, and succeeded in losing its proprietor a sum, at the lowest estimate, of £25,000. What it cost Mr. Smith in anxiety and personal worry no one has been able to calculate. Mr. Greenwood was editor of both morning and evening paper, but Mr. Smith personally superintended the production of the morning paper. Night after night he would come down after dinner in evening dress and remain until the paper went to press. The Daily News had just been reduced
