

One month before his fifteenth birthday, the parents of Jim Cash Perry (J.C. for short) asked him what he wanted as a gift. His answer could not have been more surprising.

"I want your permission to work at the convenience store in town," the teenager said with a lot of excitement.

His mom needed to make sure she had heard correctly. "You just said that for your birthday, you want a job?" she said in a confused tone.

"Yes, I've been speaking with Mrs. Harmon, and she said that if you gave permission, I could work there on Saturdays!"

J.C.'s father spoke up. "Well, if Mrs. Harmon is ok with it, I am ok with it," he said.

Each day after school, J.C. had been stopping by the convenience store. He observed everything about the store. He studied how Mrs. Harmon displayed items and how customers would decide which products to buy.

He knew what aisles to go down for specific foods or tools.

He knew the differences between the various brands and types.

Sometimes when he heard a customer asking a question, he would chime in with the answer.

J.C. also noticed that customers liked the store to be clean and organized. He saw that when Mrs. Harmon was not helping a customer, she was constantly sweeping the floor, wiping down countertops, or straightening the shelves.
