THE STORY of the American flag is one of evolution. While various flags were carried by the Continental troops during the Revolution they were regimental colors only.

Our first actual American flag was raised by John Paul Jones on the ship-of-war Ranger in the Delaware River, December 3, 1775. For this reason it has also been called our first navy jack. In 1795 the battleship was renamed and a flag of thirteen horizontal red and white stripes, five over all American vessels. It was saluted by a French fleet in Quiberon Bay, France, February 14, 1775, when Paul Jones carried the news of General Burgoyne's surrender. It also appeared upon all government documents until 1777.

On January 3, 1776, a flag waved over General Washington's headquarters at Cambridge, known as the "grand union flag," due to the union of the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew in the canton. This was the ensign of the East India Company that had flourished since 1600. While it has been called our first navy ensign because it was possibly on a Continental vessel in 1775, General Washington established its first adoption. From it originated the thirteen stripes in the American flag.

This flag was used until October, 1777.

The flag adopted by Congress on June 14, 1777, did not receive any public recognition until 1795 when it had thirteen stars in a circle and two in the corner, and was never carried in the Continental army or navy.

The flag of 1795 was not in general use until 1818.

No army or navy record mentions the stars and stripes until 1860, nor does it appear in any army regulations until that year. Our popular Betty Ross story is a myth.

Congress adopted a flag on July 4, 1818, having twenty white stars on a blue field and thirteen red and a white stripes.

Since then a star has been added to the constellation as each new state was born, so that the flag today has forty-eight stars and thirteen stripes.

Our first actual American flag was raised by John Paul Jones, December 3, 1775
