Summer Of The Burning:

Summer of the Burning Frances Riker Duncombe, 1976 After their house is burned down by the British and their mother dies from the effects of childbirth a young girl finds herself responsible for keeping her younger brothers and sisters together and somehow rebuilding their home Management of the Red-cockaded Woodpecker and Its Habitat on National Forests in the Southern Region, 1995 Prescribed Burning Symposium, Proceedings, April 14-16, 1971, Charleston, South Carolina United States. Forest Service, 1971 Marsh Burning and Weeds, 1991 Forest Regeneration Manual Mary L. Duryea, P.M. Dougherty, 2012-12-06 The Forest Regeneration Manual presents state of the art information about current regeneration practices for southern pines in the United States Over 1 2 billion seedlings of five major species loblolly slash longleaf sand and shortleaf are planted each year In 22 chapters the Manual details fundamental steps in establishing successful young pine plantations regeneration planning including economic and legal aspects regeneration harvest methods propagation by seed and vegetative techniques bareroot and container seedling culturing in the nursery measures of seedling quality site potential environment associated vegetation soils matching species to sites site preparation mechanical and chemical methods fire fertilization seedling handling before planting planting practices and measures of regeneration success promoting early plantation growth and management of competing vegetation insects disease and wildlife Forest Residues in Hemlock-spruce Forests of the Pacific Northwest and Alaska Robert H. Ruth, A. S. Harris, 1975 The forest manager must balance all the interacting and often conflicting factors influencing residue management and decide on the best course of action He needs to determine optimum volume size and arrangement of residues to leave on an area after logging then to select the harvesting methods and residue management alternatives that best provide these conditions Cramer 1974 summarized environmental effects of forest residues management for major forest types in the Pacific Northwest but types of treatment were not listed and only minor attention was given to hemlock spruce forests Residue management guidelines have been prepared for Oregon and Washington Pierovich et al 1975 but the hemlock spruce type is not discussed as a separate entity Alaska is not included in either report This report provides a detailed look at residue management throughout the north Pacific coastal fog belt including Oregon Washington British Columbia and Alaska The approach is a general look at forest residues as part of the ecosystem then a closer look at dead and decaying material after logging considering fire hazard and the silvicultural physical chemical and esthetic effects of this material Residue treatments are described evaluated and recommended The report is intended to provide an improved scientific framework for management decisions The coastal environment is more moist than other parts of the Pacific Northwest Generally fire danger is low and the need for residue treatment to reduce fire hazard is limited to special situations Northward into Alaska increasing summer precipitation relegates fire danger to a subordinate management problem Hemlock spruce residue volumes may range up to 250 tons per acre 560 metric tons per hectare when an old growth timber stand is defective and has a high proportion of western red cedar but volumes may be less than 50 tons per acre 112 metric tons per ha with more complete utilization of sound young timber The trend is to less residue volume as defective timber is replaced by vigorous young stands and utilization improves Residues often dominate the post logging environment and are a major factor influencing forest regeneration Fresh residue intercepts natural seed fall or aerially sown seed and prevents seedling establishment but later as it decays and with moisture present it becomes a suitable seed bed for hemlock and spruce Advance regeneration usually hemlock grows on decaying residue material and almost invariably is intermixed with fresh logging residue Its fate is determined by residue treatment When residue treatments expose mineral soil they influence species composition favoring several species These ecological relationships between forest residues and conifer seedlings can be used by forest managers to influence density and species composition of the new timber stand A common problem in hemlock spruce is too many seedlings When advance regeneration is prolific harvesting plans and residue treatments should be designed to destroy some of the seedlings Overstocking with post logging regeneration can be reduced if the logging operation is planned so that fresh slash covers an appropriate portion of suitable seed beds In special situations individual factors carry heavy weight in residue management decisions For soils with high erosion potential a protective mantle of organic material should be left At least the small residue material should be left on nutrient deficient soils to add to the nutrient capital Residue should be kept out of stream channels In Oregon and Washington broadcast burning of residues in heavy brush areas helps to control the brush and open up the area for planting Mistletoe infested seedlings should be classed as residue and destroyed as part of disease control programs Special attention should be given to residue management in recreation and scenic areas Large continuous areas of logging slash should be avoided because of fire hazard Smoke management plans should be followed Treatments are needed when residue volume is too great because the residue will interfere with seedling establishment and intensive management of the new stand
