Pastiche of Columbus, Politics and Puppets, Tinged With Pathos

By STEPHEN HOLDEN

Peter Schumann's Bread and Puppet Theater has never shrunk from taking on issues whose scope more than matches the dimensions of the giant puppet masks and figures that the company commonly uses in its productions. And in "Columbus: The New World Order," the two-and-a-half-hour play that inaugurated the Public Theater's international festival of puppetry on Monday afternoon, the topic is nothing less than Christopher Columbus's voyage to the New World in 1492 and its consequences. With Mr. Schumann being devoutly pacifist and left-wing, the fable that unfolds is a brutal tale of conquest, destruction and oppression that ends with an ambiguous warning.

The work, which incorporates text by Mark Twain, Jayce Salloum and Max Schumann, is divided into indoor and outdoor sections. Monday afternoon saw the only New York performance with the outdoor part included. The final performance of the first part, which is far and away the better half, will be at 8 tonight at the Public Theater.

The considerable power of the Bread and Puppet Theater's work lies in its skill at creating expressionist, and often giant-size, puppet masks that have the impact of strong political cartoons then using them in ritualistic scenarios whose most resonant moments transcend agitprop.

In the first section of the work, each of the play's seven scenes is introduced by an actor in a skeleton's costume turning a scroll on an easel as a red light flashes and a beep sounds. At the end of each scene, a precise description of the deadly capabilities of weaponry used in the Persian Gulf War is recited. In crude, mythically weighted strokes, the scenes evoke Columbus's birth, his dealings with the Spanish court, his journey and arrival and the conquest and oppression of the New World's native peoples.

Among the play's more insistent themes is the invocation of Christianity to justify all the conquest and bloodshed. In a ceremony early in the play, a blessing of wine is drawn from the arms of a statue of the crucified Jesus.

Another recurrent motif is the image of everyday people turned into grotesque automatons. In the first part, they are sailors dressed in identical prison-stripe uniforms who hold up placards that give the percentages from bogus public-opinion polls. Later they reappear as literally faceless bureaucrats in baggy suits and eyeless, lipless shoe-shape masks, spouting clichés like "have a nice day" while marching around in formation.

In the most gripping scene, the cutout figures of babies in their mothers' arms are wrenched from their grasp by the conquerors wielding hooks and cables as the eggheaded figure of Columbus, looking a bit like George Washington, watches impassively. The United States is represented by a figure draped in red whose head is a collection of pink-skinned papier-mâché faces around a miniature American flag. The section ends with the establishment of "the New World order" and the waving of that flag.

After the indoor section on Monday, the actors, augmented by at least a score of volunteers, moved the play outside, where the audience, led by a brass band, marched under the mast of the Santa Maria into the heart of Washington Square Park. The image of Columbus changed into a character named Uncle Fatso, who oversees the conversion of Quebec's northern wilderness into a sprawling hydroelectric project. The most striking scenes portray the destruction of trees and animals whose deaths are staged as a series of ritual executions on a kind of scaffold.

Although the lengthy outdoor section included too many songs and lectures, which were nearly inaudible, and too much marching around, it concluded with an image so striking that it was almost worth the wait. Eight actors appeared bearing a giant representation of Mother Nature, a severe, enigmatic figure with ancient wizened features. Clumsily waving her giant hands, she drew the cast to her bosom, then manipulated
