Uglow The love story of Zippa and Tony is nothing without the context of the Second World War The war introduced them they met as blackout wardens in London It gave them darkened streets to wander in hand in hand then by sending Tony away to officer training camps it sharpened their hunger for each other casting a glow over his comings and goings It turned them into schemers and wingers against fate and army regulations It pressed them into marriage and when the war decided to deploy him to North Africa it whispered the urgent question of a baby To which Tony thinking of the war replied maybe not and Zippa thinking of the war said yes In spite of themselves the war experience was changing them both and yet both were hanging on looking back suspended in memory and time and living from letter to letter Decades later their daughter Julie discovered their letters and piecing them together began to create a portrait of her parents and their relationship that was completely unfamiliar to her Vivid honest and completely absorbing Damn This War is a true insight into a wartime love story
