

A Strategy for Reducing Inequalities in Central America and the Dominican Republic

November 2020 – No. 8 | UE-AFD Research Facility on Inequalities

PITCH

Reducing economic and social inequalities in Central America and the Dominican Republic requires a new productive model, focused particularly on improving opportunities for women and young people in areas of social exclusion. New research on inequalities across four dimensions – life and health; living conditions; financial autonomy and dignified work; and personal and legal security – reveals the lack of access to the benefits of development facing many people in the region. These inequalities – between and within social groups, and across different geographical areas – seem to be at the root of recent political, social, and economic turbulence.

MOTIVATION

The region of Latin America and the Caribbean has largely succeeded in reducing extreme poverty over the last decade, but inequalities of income and wealth remain the highest in the world, and they have damaged sustainable growth and social inclusion. It has been the focus of regional bodies within the sub-region of Central America and the Dominican Republic seeking to foster integration and human development through regional policies, such as the Central America Integration System.

In an effort to inform policy-making and bridge the gap between research, policy, and practice, the new study takes a multidimensional perspective to understanding inequalities in the sub-region, identifying potential causes, and exploring a policy approach for tackling them.

METHODS

The study analyzes secondary data and existing research evidence, using the Oxfam and ISE Multidimensional Inequality Framework, which identifies inequalities in seven areas or domains of life, such as health, education, and living conditions. Each domain has a number of sub-domains and a set of indicators and measures, disaggregated by at least two or three relevant dimensions – gender, location, income or age – which make it possible to look at horizontal inequalities (those between different groups of people), vertical inequalities (those between individuals by economic level), and spatial inequalities (those between people in different geographical areas). The selection of domains, sub-domains, indicators, and relevant horizontal dimensions for disaggregation was done in consultation with experts, and also determined by data availability. The analysis of indicators and disaggregations, as well as the analysis of critical drivers, were discussed and validated in a workshop with experts from academia, development institutions, and civil society organizations.

RESULTS

The results show that there are different horizontal and vertical inequalities in the four priority domains for Central America and the Dominican Republic: life and health; living conditions; financial autonomy and dignified work; and personal and legal security.

In terms of people's ability to enjoy safe lives, diminishing exposure to violence, within a context of high levels of generalized violence in the sub-region, is essential for closing inequalities. Violence is also an extreme effect of inequalities: adolescents and young adult men (those aged 15-44) are especially affected by homicidal violence, particularly in border and coastal crossing areas in El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras. Sexual violence has its biggest effects on women with more children, a history of family violence, and partners who consume alcohol and have sexist attitudes.
