This effort arose from a need of the US Army's Biomedical Research and Development Laboratory to understand potential adverse health impacts of the use of hand held anti tank weapon systems An approach was developed and validated for sampled and chemical characterization of the rocket motor exhaust generated from the firing of scaled down test motors Major exhaust constituents were sampled and analyzed and in near real time while performing off site analyses samples were collected for determination of trace constituents of the particulate and vapor phases Interfaces studies were performed using atmospheric pressure burns of 1g quantities of propellants Carbon monoxide and carbon dioxide were determined using non dispersive infrared instrumentation Airborne particulate mass concentration was determined using infrared forward scattering measurements a tapered element oscillating microbalance and conventional gravimetry Particulate phase metals were determined using Teflon membrane filters followed by inductively coupled plasma and atomic absorption analysis Particulate phase polynuclear aromatic hydrocarbons PAH and nitro PAH were collected on a two stage filter Target species were extracted and quantified
