Abstract The aim of this study is to provide urban planning procedures tailored to the needs of disabled people. For this, it analyzes the problems of disabled people, especially physically disabled people, for living in Iran's cities. It also analyses various planning and design characteristics of buildings in Iranian cities. Research methods of this paper are problem-oriented theoretical studies, case studies, a weighted sum method, and a Benchmarking technique. The methods assist to provide relevant standard indicators and a theoretical framework for the comparison of the cities to an optimal alternative. A case study strategy to gather data for certain comparisons and present a disabled-oriented model of urban planning has been performed. The weighted sum method dedicates quantitative scores and performs the comparison and judgment. Finally, this paper concludes that the cities in Iran are not appropriate to the physical and administrative needs of the disabled. This study finds that buildings in Iranian cities often lack the necessary standards for the needs of the disabled. The outcomes of this research concerning urban planning for disabled people will assist better disabled-oriented urban planning, design, and development everywhere in the world.

1 Introduction

Many people with disabilities, particularly physically disabled people are living in this world. On the other hand, cities have been built for people who have a strong and healthy body [1]. Though, all citizens of the cities, including the disabled, have the right to enjoy living and working opportunities in the cities. The importance of equality of citizenship is that persons with disabilities enjoy the facilities available in urban public spaces like other people in society. People with physical disabilities are usually unable to move around in cities due to the physical barriers, unfair land-use policies, non-standard building, and inadequate accessible public spaces [2]. Some advanced countries of the world noticed the needs of persons with disabilities returning from wars since the eighties. The issue became even more important when the social dimension of the problem expanded. The countries implemented applications that guaranteed movement of physically disabled people in the cities without problems. A new responsibility was also created under the title of "Access Officer" who drafted urban development standards based on the recommendations of the disabled society. Monitoring the compatibility of existing buildings with the needs of the physically disabled people and the accessibility of urban spaces in new designs were performed. The establishment of the access officer has been a major shift towards adapting urban spaces for the use of the disabled and securing their rights in the process of urban planning and development [3]. Urban development schemes in the advanced countries are now implementing the requirements of urban space adaptation with the right urban land use planning, building standards, and regulations in place. Salmela i.e. researched about this fact in Malmö [4]. The Scandinavian countries, including Sweden,
