Contemporary Pavilions for a Hall on Puget Sound

erickson recognizes how consistently pursued regional architecture with a profound insight. By combining deep empathy for a site and the needs of his clients with his own palette of universal shapes and principles, he creates an architecture that is genuinely of a place, not a remarkable cliché. For a Washington State couple, Erickson has designed a house that is a marked departure from his usual style, but in finding a solution that was appropriate for the land telling us, Erickson remained faithful to his longtime belief that good architecture is a process of discovery, not a direct derivation to preconceived notions. The final result is a regionality with meaning.

The residents had approached Erickson on the advice of architect friends and a son who had seen Erickson's famous Simon Fraser University near Vancouver. They were immediately impressed by Erickson's willingness to listen to their suggestioners of granite, cedar and glass make up the contemporary Northwest style house that combines traditional regional forms with a modern look. Erickson designed a two-story house with a large, open-plan living area, a large kitchen, a large dining area, a large bedroom, a large bathroom, a large garage, and a large porch. The house is a perfect blend of old and new, and it is a true masterpiece. The architecture is a perfect blend of old and new, and it is a true masterpiece.
