

on the text of the so-called Apostolic tradition. The issues raised here have been further debated by myself with Bradshaw, Cerrato and Stewart Sykes in the St Vladimir Orthodox Review xlviii/2–3 (2004). I remain unconvinced that the series of inconclusive caveats amounting to argumenta e silentio that trade on the fragmentary character of witnesses to liturgical practices from the second to the fourth century seriously undermines the connection between the composite document that has become known as the Apostolic tradition and ecclesiastical events in Rome in the early third century. Simply because the Egyptian church order cannot be linked to the work of a single writer whose title appears on his statue does not mean that we cannot trace within the events at Rome described in the Hippolytan corpus themes and currents that represent the playing out of those events. The authors nevertheless have made an important contribution to the discussion in providing an English version of the various witnesses to the text and an interesting challenge to an established point of view.

The Apostles' Creed. Origin, history, and some early commentaries. By Liuwe H. Westra. (Instrumenta Patristica et Mediaevalia. Research on the Inheritance of Early and Medieval Christianity, 43.) Pp. v + 603 + 2 colour frontispieces. Turnhout: Brepols, 2002. €95. 2503 51395 6

This is the most extensive contribution to the development of the Apostles' Creed (T, i.e. textus receptus) in recent years. Westra strongly disagrees with the view, recently suggested by M. Vinzent and this reviewer, that the precursor of T, the so-called Old Roman Creed (R), does not predate the fourth century and that it had its origins in the debates about the theology of Marcellus at the Synod of Rome in 340/1 which rehabilitated the bishop of Ancyra. Instead he restates the older view that we have to look for precursors of R in the pre-Constantinian Church. In modifying a theory first put forward by P. Smulders, Westra suggests the existence of a creed called 'proto-R' which he calls 'the hypothetical parent of all extant variants of the Apostles' Creed' (p. 68) and which he dates to the middle of the third century. Be that as it may (and I have strong doubts as regards the validity of his argument which I will set out elsewhere), the main thrust of Westra's book is not about the origin of R but rather about the period between the formulation R and the time of Charlemagne who decreed in 811–13 that the same form of the creed (i.e. T) had to be used by his clergy. Westra carefully collects all evidence available which, in one way or another, pertains to the development of T, and in some cases even provides us with new editions of credal texts that had hitherto been only available in uncritical versions. Westra groups these texts according to regional provenance (Gaul, Spain, Africa, Northern Italy and others). When one surveys all these sources one is struck by the high number of variants in the wording of the Creed. Westra points out that in most cases these variations do not appear to have constituted a major problem and are passed over in silence. The Creed was altered in order to adapt it to changing dogmatic or pastoral needs or because of the stylistic idiosyncrasies of a particular author. In addition, there are variations that are best explained by assuming the
