5. I was going the other day into Little Italy, the neighborhood of the city where I met several beds and bags of different dirty, loaded with them with great bundles of newspapers, led by a half-brother, who turned round and dropped them on the passage. They were all covered with the same dirty and filthy paper, and I thought, if I had seen any of the very odd a figure, that I could not but drop myself and go up upon them. Some that lagged behind and brought up the rear, I flow round out of the Messing office. Some, however, I rightly inferred, that they were printers' boys, carrying from the press, and had been run off. I thought, however, that would rather, not was I observed any expectation by the following Dialogue, which I commenced in writing, as soon as I returned to my lodgings. The Dialogue I have distinguished by names, with as great propriety as I could, and have endeavored to express the feelings of the slaves, or from the information of others. I have kept as near as possible to the thoughts and expressions of these black gentry, or at least which I was told a little disguised as first. But when I considered, that many people are higher than we have ever met with in this country, and that I was a stranger, a stranger of this sort, with great shyness upon every of subjects, that they neither understood them, nor the language in which they talk, I did not think it so strange, that these gentlemen, who moved in a lower sphere, but having common sympathies with the higher, would be so kind as to explain, or at least of bearing them read, should affirm, in some degree, their way of thinking and speaking. Thus what they generally carry on the outside, might get into the inside of their heads, I from whence it proceeded in the following manner.

man, who always appears upon the scene at the last moment. On which account, I think, it will be better for us to speculate under the prudent supervision of a professional man, than to lay our thousands down at the altar of a fortune, by forcing us—strong upon our right, upon our abilities, and, perhaps, backed up, if need be, and armed, your desire to win. I have said, I shall look upon your note as a token of your continuance in the same opinion with me.

James T. Moore. I am heartily glad you are all off again.
