The Double Homicide Disguised Crimes:

The Double Homicide Damon Laurent Agobe, 2003 The Double Homicide offers an autobiographical work in which the author seeks to relay a journal of memories of unexplained events and deaths related to sorcery practices in and around his home village Bossou in the Ivory Coast He opens with an introduction of the disguised crimes in which the victims do not see their assailants as opposed to the open crime where the criminal uses a weapon He asserts that God made some of his power available to human to be utilized positively and creatively for the good of all It was not meant to be used negatively and deviously by associating it with evil spirits and transforming it into sorcery and witchcraft and using it to kill and destroy others properties and blessings like it is today He sites bibliographical references from the book of Genesis to back his idea that evil that we are victims of or the practice of sorcery that we are experiencing today is not new it all evolved when mankind fell into sin after being induced into it by the devil taking advantage of man's naivete then corrupting the world henceforth But there is hope and I am optimistic that in the name of Jesus the world will get back its mormacy He continues and explains how a driver named Goubou was thwarted in his marriage plans with the chief's daughter by unseen forces and mistaken events The story unfolds and shows how Kolongou one of the chief's sons was sacrificed and sent to go hunting with Goubou Kolongou was prepared mystically to be transformed into a deer once in the bush and be killed such as using a small fish to catch a trout In the Double Homicide the author's tale reveals that death no matter where and how it occurs is ever perceived naturally as the end of life cycle His descriptions of rituals ceremonies and ideologies central to West African Culture are designed to augment the scope and tone of this chronicle
