Activity No.2 SPECIFIC HEAT OF SOLIDS

INTRODUCTION

Calorimetry means “measuring heat.” When heat flow occurs between two bodies that are isolated from their surroundings, the amount of heat lost by one body must be equal to the amount of heat gained by the other. Heat is a form of energy in transit, so this principle is just a conservation of energy. We take each quantity added to a body as positive and each quantity leaving a body as negative. When several bodies interact, the algebraic sum of the quantities of heat transferred to all the bodies must be zero.

The mathematical representation of the amount of heat Q needed to achieve a temperature change by a material with mass m and specific heat capacity c is where T = final temperature, and initial temperature.

In an isolated system, there is no transfer of either mass or energy to its environment. For such case the total heat in the system is conserved, that is,

1. Fill the steam generator 1/2 full of water and start heating it over the stove. Set the stove range dial to medium.
2. Record the two kinds of metal shots in Table 2.1.
3. Weigh about 100 grams of the first metal shots. Pour these in the steam can (inner cup of the steam generator) and place the can in the steam generator. Cover the steam can with a cork with two holes, one for the thermometer and the other for the stirrer. Heat the shots over the steam generator and stir occasionally. Do not use the thermometer to stir the shots but keep the thermometer embedded in the shots.
