

DISCUSSION AND CONCLUSION

In the present study, the potential analgesic effect of the petroleum ether extract of Borovilla umbellulata Linn. was investigated. The results indicate that the oral administration of PERO exhibits significant analgesic dependent protective effect on chemical (acetic acid) induced and thermal (hot pot) induced nociception in the doses of 200 and 400 mg/kg and indicate that PERO possess both peripheral (inhibitory reduction and central (antagonism of full withdrawal) effects.

The intraperitoneal administration of acetic acid that irritate nociceptive nociceptors provokes a nociceptor behavior in mice and rats, which is characterized by abdominal contractions, movements of the body as a whole, rearing of thoracolumbar muscles, and a reduction in motor activity and coordination [10]. The quantification of proinflammatory by Radio immune assay in the petroleum extract of rats observed after the intraperitoneal injection of acetic acid demonstrated high levels of prostaglandins PGI_2 and PGF_2 during 30 min after stimulation [6].

On the other hand, the lack of influence of extracts of Borovilla umbellulata Linn. on the nociception test of mice subjected to the full immersion in camphor with the interpretation that its analgesic property does not have a central origin, having an analgesic effect in the acetic acid swelling test that is mostly mediated via a peripheral mechanism the interfering with the local reaction caused by the irritant or by inhibiting the synthesis, release and/or antagonizing the action of pain mediators in the target sites [7]. Finally, the results of the present study confirm that Borovilla umbellulata Linn. has analgesic properties.
