Energy though not financially strong enough to invest in new nuclear power stations itself owned land viewed by industry as being in the most suitable places for them The Department did not however secure a binding commitment from EDF to build new nuclear power stations The report adds it also failed to establish whether EDF had previously built any new nuclear power stations without public subsidy A number of factors including planning decisions could result in EDF abandoning its plans to build new nuclear powers stations with or without public subsidy The Shareholder Executive hired investment bankers UBS at a cost of 4 million equivalent to a monthly payment of around 400 000 to advise on sale tactics assist with negotiations and provide valuations of British Energy The Committee considers it unacceptable that the Shareholder Executive considered it necessary to spend so much on external advice when it is supposed to possess expertise in these areas The Government was fortunate in selling its interest in British Energy when energy prices were at a peak The 4 4 billion sale proceeds were allocated to the Nuclear Liabilities Fund to put towards the future cost of decommissioning British Energy s existing power stations
