Delusions of a Popular Mind Martha McFerren, 1983 Open Field, Understory James Seay, 1997-01-01 This superb collection of new and older work shows James Seay's sure progress from the reflection of first influences to the strongly individual voice of his later pieces As always Seay evokes a profound sense of history and place the landscape colors scents and musical vocal cadences of his native South and the world at large Poems like Where Books Fall Open reflect a community of souls striving toward what Whittier called sweetness near Seay generously establishes the kinship between such longings whether rooted in nostalgia or the resonance of the unnameable The masterly Said There Was Somebody Talking to Him Through the Air Conditioner explores the dialectic of storytelling itself its claim to whatever demands to be freed from fact In this poem the urgency of Seay's long knotty lines limn with chilling precision the exact shape and dimension of the rift between the physical act and the story it tells Yet though the compulsion to tell stories when the truth won't work may be our downfall Seay shows us that stories are also prisms refracting each seemingly simple moment into infinite complexity The stories in these beautifully wrought poems offer us

swift glimpses of grace when the fragmentary individual memory flares is transformed and becomes the story we have all been waiting for the one that frees the body from the fact of itself Comic sad reflective exuberant Open Field Understory glows with the worn unselfconscious beauty of broken in leather This is a marvelous book by an important modern poet
