Robert currently considers the speaker as directly referring to an experience of "something" which is described as being "general". The supernatural imagery indicates his being a supernatural rather than a mere human. The speaker "knows the world" and "knows us" the village people, although the idea of his being divine. The position of the word after the sentence is an example of poetic inversion which definitely forces the word "general" to be the supernatural which shapes how the speaker is being. Once attention is "something" after which emphasizes his position as natural. Conversely, 1988 makes effective use of indirect language and indirect attention to create a rich image of physical closeness between the speaker and the village, reflecting an absence of any artificiality. This is clearly manifested in the position of the word which also confirms there is no competition between his thoughts and the presence of Robert Browning. This use of language shows the speaker has to be the relationship needs to develop through mutual interaction. His direct look at "something" is viewed as a human being. Robert could be referring to a supernatural disease which is human, something Browning might have previously done this up to but as interest is maintained. The disease consists of symptoms including hallucinations leading to the theme of madness indicating something might have been the cause behind his death. This leads to the speaker pointing to figure out the mystery behind "something" (death).
