Abstract

Psychedelic-assisted therapy could transform treating psychiatric illness, but harms from exacerbating substance use disorder (SUD) among adults with psychiatric illness using psychedelics have not been studied. A cross-sectional survey in the US was used to test whether Drug Abuse Screening Test scores (DAST-10, validated instrument predicting SUD) were more severe when psychiatric illnesses (anxiety disorder, major depressive disorder [MDD], post-traumatic stress disorder [PTSD], and bipolar disorder) and serotonergic psychedelic or MDMA use were combined. Any psychedelic use among adults with psychiatric illness history (anxiety: 5.1% [95% CI: 4.7, 5.6]; MDD: 5.1% [4.3, 5.8]; PTSD: 6.9% [5.9, 7.9]; bipolar: 9.2% [8.0, 10.5]) was more prevalent than the general population (2.6% [2.5, 2.8]). Significant increases in scores were associated with psychedelic use independent of other concurrent drug use, but increases were smaller than for opioids or stimulants. Approaches to managing SUD risks with psychedelics should differ from past approaches for other drugs.

Keywords Psychedelics · MDMA · Psilocybin · Psychiatric illness · LSD · US population

Little has been done to explore the potential risks of substance use disorder (SUD) associated with psychedelic use among those with psychiatric illness in a community setting. Psychedelic use has more than doubled globally from 2015 to 2020 based on the Global Drug Survey (Winstock et al., 2021), where diverse classes of psychedelic drugs are now used to manage psychiatric conditions or emotional distress. Individuals with psychological illness are especially likely to be diagnosed with an SUD and require special attention
