Reproduction has constituted a central theme for second wave feminist theory and practice, ranging from the politicization of issues such as contraceptive access, abortion, and childcare, to mothering as a basis for feminist ethics. In this context, practices such as abortion and contraception have primarily been considered as individual technologies, and their access framed in terms of women's individual rights. In more recent years, the emergence of new reproductive technologies and genetic testing has given rise to increasingly medicalized public debates questioning the scope for individual choice, while older feminist gains, particularly in the areas of abortion rights, have been the target of renewed attacks in many national contexts. Yet, as 20th century history has shown, female sexuality and reproductive choices have also been the object of more collective pre-occupations and practices of population management, perhaps most notoriously so in the context of eugenics (see, for example, Mottier and Gerodetti, 2007). Overly individualistic approaches which frame access to reproductive technologies in terms of the rights of individual women thus run the risk of glossing over wider structural gender inequalities, as well as the ways in which collective preoccupations and national politics are played out in this domain.

The current special issue on feminism(s) and the politics of reproduction was prompted by our belief that recent developments in research and public debates around new reproductive technologies signal the need for renewed feminist attention to the politics of reproduction. In the early years of second wave feminism, Shulamith Firestone's Dialectic of Sex (1970) famously suggested that the problematic linking of woman and nature could be dissolved through artificial reproduction and contraception, and that technology would help liberate women from the constraints of motherhood. Firestone's optimism about the potential benefits of technology was countered by sceptics such as Michelle Stanworth, who expressed concern that those controlling reproductive technologies would 'gain unprecedented control over motherhood itself' (Stanworth, 1994: 232). In contrast, current feminist debates no longer centre primarily on whether reproductive technology is intrinsically 'good' or 'bad', but rather on the politics of pregnancy experiences (abortion and memorializing), on
