

Structural Adjustment in Africa

■ Seamus Cleary

At least some structural adjustment programmes have had negative effects on the quality of life of African people. Many of the causes of Africa's deepening economic crisis stem from events outside its control. Nevertheless, adjustment to altered economic circumstances and market conditions is unavoidable. The scope for African governments to embark on adjustment programmes outside the orthodox framework is severely limited. But the appropriateness of this model in African conditions is questionable particularly in view of the human impact of the programmes. These include rising food prices, unemployment and deterioration in health and education services threatening the political stability of African countries. Adjustment programmes need to be fundamentally re-designed if they are to contribute to sustainable development in Africa.

Currently, some thirty Sub-Saharan African countries are implementing structural adjustment programmes. The essence of these programmes is the reduction/removal of direct state intervention in the productive and distributive sectors of the economy and the restriction of the State's role to the creation, mainly through the manipulation of fiscal and monetary instruments, of an institutional and policy framework conducive to the mobilisation of private enterprise and initiative.¹
