The Doomed Pilots of 1969 The Results of Advice Ignored by Andy McCue In the early 1960s Seattle s city fathers were confident their city was an attractive and growing market In 1961 the city commissioned a Stanford Research Institute study to assess what was needed to gain major league sports especially baseball The think tank s study came back cautiously positive Attracting major league baseball was possible the report said if the city could meet three conditions It would need to provide a major league quality stadium and the team would need to find support from both the political financial leadership and the fan base Ultimately they would founder on all three sinking the Seattle Pilots franchise barely after it had left the dock

Were Pitchers More Likely to Throw at Black Batters 1947-66 by Jerry Nechal A generally accepted narrative of the early days of baseball integration is that White pitchers deliberately threw at Black batters Besides the need for statistical confirmation of the anecdotes there are other important questions to ask If widespread targeting did happen how long did it last Was the practice curtailed as more Black players entered the leagues The ranking of batters by the number of times hit per season 1947-56 reveals evidence to support the narrative This study will explore the answers to these questions by examining data covering a longer time period 1947 through 1966 As well as articles about why fewer triples are hit today than in the past the forgotten six man variant of baseball using data visualization on the 2020 season the tribulations faced by the Phillies when trying to enter the National League and the remarkable 1919 season of the Klein Chocolate Company baseball team among others      Baseball Research Journal (Brj), Volume 49 #2 Society for American Baseball Research (Sabr),2021-01-06
