RHINOCEROTIDAE

Rhinoceros Family
Of the living perissodactyl mammals, only the rhinoceroses share the massive, bulky build and the thick, wrinkled skin that was so common among the saurians, now extinct among the saurians. There are 5 species of rhinoceroses, found in Africa and Southeast Asia, and all have large heads and small bodies. The legs are short and stout, with the skin on the legs being extremely thick and the skin on the body being only a few inches thick. Males and females look much alike, but females tend to have smaller horns.

Asian Indian Rhinoceros, Rhinoceros unicornis
Asian India, N.E. India
Habitat: grassland to swampy areas
Body: 4.2 m (13 ft 6 in)
Tail: 1.2 m (4 ft)

The largest of the Asian species, the Indian rhinoceros has a thick, dark-grey hide marked with many small protuberances. The skin follows deep folds at the joints, giving the rhinoceros an armor-plated appearance. Each year has a single horn on the head, but the female's horn is smaller. Generally a solitary animal, the Indian rhinoceros feeds in the morning and evening on grass, weeds and twigs and more during the remainder of the day.

The female gives birth to a single young after a gestation of about 15 months. The young rhinoceros is active even after birth and is suckled for up to 2 years.

Asian Sumatran Rhinoceros, Rhinoceros sumatrensis
Sumatra, Indonesia
Habitat: dense forest, near swamps
Body: 2.3-2.8 m (7 ft 6 in-9 ft 2 in)
Tail: about 40 cm (16 in)

The smallest member of its family, the Sumatran rhinoceros has two horns, most of the female are smaller than the male's. Both horns are covered in the thick skin and fringe the edges of the nose. Sumatran rhinoceroses are usually solitary, although a male and female pair may live together. They feed mostly in the early morning and evening on ferns, twigs, fruit and bamboo shoots and may trample down small trees to browse on their foliage. Like other rhinoceroses, this species has good hearing and sense of smell, but the sight is poor.

The female bears a single young after a gestation of about 7 to 8 months.

Asian, Sumatra-dipped White Rhinoceros, Ceratotherium simum
Africa, N.W. Uganda
Habitat: savanna, floodplains
Body: 3.5-4.5 m (11 ft 6 in-14 ft 9 in)
Tail: 1.2-1.5 m (4 ft-5 ft)

The largest living land animal, the white rhinoceros has a long head, which is covered in a long, wrinkled skin. The skin is covered in a long, wrinkled skin. The skin is covered in a long, wrinkled skin. The skin is covered in a long, wrinkled skin.

Despite the size, the rhinoceros is a placid animal, usually feeding on grass. Each old male occupies his own territory, which may be shared by several males, but the female is usually accompanied by another male, with young or by her own young. Several calves. They feed on grass and twigs and more during the remainder of the day.

The female gives birth to a single young after a gestation of about 15 months. The young rhinoceros is active even after birth and is suckled for up to 2 years.

Asian, Black Rhinoceros, Rhinoceros blacki
Africa, N. Chad and Sudan
Habitat: savanna, floodplains
Body: 3-3.5 m (9 ft 8 in-11 ft 6 in)
Tail: 1.2-1.5 m (4 ft-5 ft)

The black rhinoceros is, in fact, an Indian but carries according to its habitat. It has a long neck but has a large head, but not a large body, which bears two horns, sometimes a third small horn. The lip is pointed and thick and helps the animal to browse on the leaves and shoots of small trees and bushes. Like the white rhinoceros, black rhinoceroses live alone, except for males and young. Adults live in overlapping ranges, with boundaries marked by dung heaps.

Male and female remain together only a few days when mating. The female gives birth to a single young after a gestation of about 15 months. The young rhinoceros suckles for up to 2 years and stays with its mother for 3 years, until her next calf is born.
