

NCLIS/NBS Task Force on Computer Network Protocol. The result of its one-year study, presented in this book for review by the library and information science community, is a detailed delineation of an applications-level protocol, that is, a system permitting such programs as acquisitions, cataloging, and serials control packages to exchange information. While written primarily for computer and network specialists, the text is still accessible and of interest to all those in the field concerned with the developing national network.

The work first briefly describes the main groups, suppliers as well as users, who will comprise and utilize the network, and their relationships today. Requirements for inter-computer communication are then reviewed. The authors point out that the proposed protocol is only one of several that may be needed for exchanges between computers, since several levels of software and hardware exist in every system; each level must have some means to relate to adjacent levels. Next, the role of the protocol is carefully delimited. It is intended to facilitate the transmission of data between applications programs on dissimilar systems. For example, serials control programs at Columbia University and UCLA could converse with each other, in spite of their structural differences, using the protocol. A detailed account of the protocol, including its two message classes, their format, and all the various fields, is followed by eight recommendations for further study. Seven helpful appendices, among them a glossary, a bibliography, and a complete sample version of the protocol's use, illustrating and explaining the fields and their functions, complete the book.

The protocol itself is simple. Any message from one applications program to another consists of four sections. The first, a header length field of sixteen bits, precedes the variable length header section. The header identifies the communicating parties, records the billing (if any), directs the information transaction and reports on its status. A sixteen bit data length field is followed by the data section, which relates the nature and purpose of the communication. Applications programs interpret each field by its tag, as is done with MARK records. The code "2117" in the header section, for example, is a BULLETIN MESSAGE control message, while "131511Y11111111111111111111" is recognized as the date and time.

No case is made for adoption of the protocol. The Task Force instead gives a modest and lucid presentation of what the protocol is and is not expected to accomplish. Its best recommendation is that potential users—individual institutions as well as organizations such as ALA, ANSI and ASTM—study the protocol and test it at several sites to determine its effectiveness and identify any problems. Positive results from such studies could mean that the goal of a national library and information science network is one step closer to reality.

ROBERT W. HARR

The Multimedia Library: Materials Selection and Use. JAMES CALBOCCIANI. Academic Press, New York, 1978. 275 p. illus., charts, black and white, photos, illus., subject index.

The effective librarian, whether a recent library school graduate or an experienced in-service librarian, must make continuous decisions regarding the selection and utilization of various information media. There are many texts which provide the student of librarianship with a structured approach for developing collections of book and other print materials (e.g. Carter and Bank, Building Library Collections, 1974). In the area of nonprint media, there have been a few notable attempts to provide similar guides to the selection and use of nonbook materials in particular types of libraries, such as P. S. Groves's Nonprint Media in Academic Libraries (American Library Association, Chicago 1979). Until the appearance of James Calbocciani's text on The Multimedia Library, no single text had attempted to analyze the characteristics of each type of information medium in relation to their selection and utilization. The Multimedia Library should serve to inform the student of librarianship about the characteristics of the prevalent communication media, particularly the newer communication forms such as videotape, in addition to making the student aware of the potential applications of non traditional learning styles.

Calbocciani's perspective is based on the premise that libraries are vitally involved in the rapid communication evolution. While Calbocciani initially focuses the reader to expect a dual focus on both the characteristics of the individual communication media and their allied dissemination-program implications, the text focuses primarily on the descriptive nature of the various media. The seventeen chapters of the text can be abstractly divided into three categories: (1) Trends, Definitions, and Tools; (2) Characteristics
