

Multinational Corporations and Corporate Social Responsibility: Addressing Climate Change

Introduction

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (2014a, p. 50) warned in its most recent Assessment Report that the “world’s societies will need to both mitigate and adapt to climate change if it is to effectively avoid harmful climate impacts (robust evidence, high agreement).” It also observed with “high confidence” a more rapid rise in total anthropogenic (i.e. man-made) greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions from 2000 to 2010 than in the past three decades that “were the highest in human history.” The persistent increase in GHG emissions will entail a continuing process of global warming (OECD, 2008) and can alter the climate system (IPCC, 2007a; 2007b). The United Nations Development Programme (2008, p. 16) characterised climate change as “the defining human development issue of our generation.” It may not be an exaggeration to assert that the survival of mankind is tied to state of the Earth’s environment (Taylor, 1998).

In response to the perceived threat of global warming, the U.N. General Assembly created the Intergovernmental Negotiating Committee (INC) for a Framework Convention on Climate Change in 1990 (Bodansky, 1993). The INC adopted the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (“Convention”) on May 9, 1992 and opened it for signature at the UN Conference on Environment and Development (Bodansky, 1993). The “ultimate” objective of the Convention is to achieve “stabilization of greenhouse gas concentrations in the atmosphere at a level that would prevent dangerous anthropogenic interference with the climate system.” It was initially signed by 154 states and the European Community, but as of September 2010 had secured 194 signatories, virtually comprising all the states (Triggs, 2011). The Convention, which came into force in 1994, has an almost universal membership and has the most number of parties to an international environmental agreement (Barrett, 2002).

The Conference of the Parties (COP), which is the supreme body of the Convention, crafted in 1997 a new binding instrument – the Kyoto Protocol – that contained specific quantified targets and timetables for controlling GHG emissions that would apply to the period after 2000 (Weiss, 2008). Although it came into force in 2005, the Kyoto Protocol was “widely seen as somewhere between troubled and terminal,” after the United States withdrew from it (Nordhaus, 2006, p. 31). Hence, the search for new and innovative solutions to climate change and global warming continues.

Most proposals, however, to address climate change focus on states, which themselves actually do not cause GHG emissions (Voigt, 2008), and fail to involve multinational corporations (MNCs) which are actually major emitters across their vast global operations (UNCTAD, 2010). Arguably MNCs should be involved in finding a solution, not only because they greatly contribute to GHG emissions, but also because of the nature of the climate change problem as a “global commons problem” that requires international cooperation from multiple actors (IPCC, 2014), including MNCs, and because MNCs can play a significant role in addressing the problem of
